SMART READER EDITIONS

The Slow Living Handbook

MAYA BENNETT

Wellness

The Slow Living Handbook

Maya Bennett

“Slow down enough to be present for your own life.”

A BOOK FOR UNHURRIED MOMENTS

Contents

A small collection of ideas to return to.

01 A gentler way to move through days 04

02 The first hour 05

03 Enough for today 06

04 A table, a window 07

05 The pleasure of ordinary things 08

A gentler way to move through days

The beginning of a day does not need to be conquered. Try entering it instead. Open a window, drink something warm, and notice one sound outside. Let your attention arrive before your agenda.

> Slow down enough to be present for your own life.

The first hour

There will always be more to do. Enough is not a finish line reached when the list is empty; it is a decision to honor your limits. Choose what matters and let the rest wait without apology.

> “Slow down enough to be present for your own life.”

Create one corner that belongs to unhurried time. It need not be beautiful by anyone else’s measure. A chair you love, a table with space for a cup, and natural light are plenty.

Enough for today

Create one corner that belongs to unhurried time. It need not be beautiful by anyone else’s measure. A chair you love, a table with space for a cup, and natural light are plenty.

> “Slow down enough to be present for your own life.”

Ordinary rituals become rich when we stop rushing through them. Washing vegetables, watering a plant, walking the familiar road home: presence reveals the detail that hurry conceals.

A table, a window

Ordinary rituals become rich when we stop rushing through them. Washing vegetables, watering a plant, walking the familiar road home: presence reveals the detail that hurry conceals.

> “Slow down enough to be present for your own life.”

Rest is not a reward for usefulness. It is a basic rhythm of being alive. You do not need to finish everything before you sit down. Sometimes the most generous thing is simply to stop.

The pleasure of ordinary things

Rest is not a reward for usefulness. It is a basic rhythm of being alive. You do not need to finish everything before you sit down. Sometimes the most generous thing is simply to stop.

> “Slow down enough to be present for your own life.”

The beginning of a day does not need to be conquered. Try entering it instead. Open a window, drink something warm, and notice one sound outside. Let your attention arrive before your agenda.